Codfish, sugar, red dye #40. Come on, what's unhealthy about that?

 trollcatzNovember 10 2009, 17:42:50 UTCCOLLAPSE

Fish. Candy.

Candied. Fish.

Pink. Candied. Fish.

Get off my planet.

What are the odds is's sustainably harvested?

Besides, your wife is from Vermont. You mean you've never tasted Indian Candy? Maple smoked salmon?

You can find it in DFW. I know. I've had it. It's good and addicting.

That sounds strangely appealing. I wonder where one might find such a thing in the Darkest Midwest.

...there's a sort of pan-Asian place where I get my bonito flakes, but I don't think they have candy. But I can ask them. (Um, what am I asking for?)

What's weird about that?

Now I want sweet salt sour dried plums.

YUM! Best candy.

 trollcatz

November 10 2009, 19:41:34 UTC COLLAPSE

Yick. I have had those, and they are awful. Like sour patch kids with salt all over them.

And there are multiple versions. I was introduced to a southern chinese variety, originally.

But then I like all kinds of dried and/or fermented fish snacks, too.

Oh! Definitely an acquired taste, but I tried them, oh, 30+ years ago and found them quite tasty. (stupid memory holes... can't remember the name, or the brand name; used to get those in Hawaii, the local version of the ice cream truck carried a whole line of things like that.)

I say fight fire with fire. Pick up a durian and just cut it open.

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Durian>

(I suggest breathing through your mouth, perhaps aided by a scented hanky, for the remainder of the day, though)

If she brings in a durian and doesn't give me any, I shall cry.

(Delicious. Except the sweat-socks flavored burps afterward.)

Ugh! Durian....

The texture is okay, but the smell... >.
